The effect of rebleeding following endoscopic hemostasis on treatment outcomes in patients with acute esophageal variceal hemorrhage. Although endoscopic treatment is an effective treatment for acute esophageal variceal hemorrhage (AEVH), rebleeding occurs frequently and is a major cause of treatment failure. We evaluated the effect of rebleeding on the treatment outcomes of AEVH. We prospectively collected the data on patients with AEVH treated with a plugging technique or variceal ligation, who were admitted to our unit between January 2005 and June 2007. Treatment outcome was assessed by the development of rebleeding within 5 days after the end of treatment or during the follow-up period. Twenty-nine patients were enrolled; plugging was the initial treatment in 18 and variceal ligation in 11. Variceal ligation was associated with a higher risk of rebleeding, and required more rebleeding treatments than plugging, although both treatment methods resulted in similar mortality and rates of initial hemostasis. Patients treated with variceal ligation, who were rebleeding after 5 days, had a significantly lower survival rate than those who did not rebleed ($P = 0.003$). In multivariate analysis, rebleeding after 5 days was an independent risk factor for treatment failure. Rebleeding after 5 days in patients with AEV 82157476af
